 Excursion (three parallel tours will be offered, see below)

Tour 1 Weißenhofsiedlung: In 1927, Stuttgart hosted the exhibition „Die Wohnung“ (the residence). German and international architects, among them Le Corbusier, Gropius, Sharoun and Mies van der Rohe, showcased what they termed “Neues Bauen” (new way of building). Until today, Weißenhofsiedlung (Weißenhof estate) epitomises modernist architecture and housing.

Tour 2 Stuttgart 21: The infrastructure and real estate project made hundred thousand citizens take to the streets in 2010, protesting against non-transparent and exclusive planning, public costs getting out of hand, questionable benefits for citizens, and patronising politics. “Stuttgart 21” promises inner-city expansion in the restricted “Kessel” (basin) of Stuttgart by moving the main station underground.

Tour 3 Refugee Housing: When the German chancellor allowed thousands of refugees into Germany in late 2015, the demand competition on the housing market increased, especially for low-income groups. After decades of public underinvestment into affordable housing, cities were forced to respond. In this context, the city of Ostfildern initiated a very successful housing project for both refugees and homeless people.
